

Baubles & Bangles

The baubles and bangles of worldly success serve very well to counter and camouflage the over-riding principle that the resources of our world need to be equitably shared among all of its inhabitants.

Worldly excesses and flagrant abuse of world resources by those who assume they can afford such actions --- sanctioned though they may be by enactments of modern man, and even seen as laudatory in his precepts --- speak eloquent volumes of the misguided view of our responsibility as individuals in our society.

It seems to be an over-arching characteristic for individuals who reach any modicum of success in their world to feel, and indeed to believe and insist, that they have a full right to expend the wealth or influence they have accumulated in whatever way they wish, as they perceive these as resources they have "earned". What rot! The slightest kink in an individual's DNA chain may well have resulted in that individual's capabilities being restricted to what everyone's involuntary muscles might allow. So ...“Earned”? You are fortunate to know your name!!

So we have profligate use of wealth and resources devoted to the whim and caprice of groups and/or individuals who lack the moral compass to guide such use. Rich men build their own islands, with man-made rocks designed to satisfy their taste; they construct mansions and edifices of scope and dimensions that boggle the common mind; they launch armadas of resources in the pursuit of perfectly useless goals; they pursue activities whose only qualifications are that someone else has never done that, or so quickly, or so high above the earth, or whatever a dwindled mind may perceive as edgy, daring and somehow worthwhile.

Really!

Baubles and bangles, tinsel and toss?

Nonsense and twaddle and dross!