

Monday Morning Quarterbacks

In society's struggle to deal with the myriad issues that confront it at every level, the last several decades have seen the exponential growth of a cadre of individuals who can be quite accurately described by the concept of "Monday Morning Quarterbacking".

These would be journalists, pundits, politicians, critics and commentators who represent themselves as having known exactly what should have been done, how, when and by whom to deal with any issue that confronted society yesterday, although they never seem to have that solution handy in time for it to make any difference.

Access to a keyboard or a microphone appears to be the only qualification required, plus, of course, a huge sense of ego and absolutely no scruples.